Genetically modified democracy

OPINION
BY STEVE HEILIG

Normally I don't watch much television, as I am easily nauseated. But when the San Francisco Giants made the playoffs and then the World Series I made sure to catch every game. As a side effect, I was exposed to many commercials and political messages. The ads were mostly silly, but I was surprised and dismayed to see so many "No on Proposition 37" messages, some featuring people I know and otherwise respect. And they prevailed, for Prop. 37 went down hard, after being strongly favored to win just a few weeks before the election.

Famed food writer Michael Pollan called Prop. 37, which he strongly favored, a "Litmus test for democracy." As that test determines acid/alkaline balance, I'm not exactly sure what he meant, but clearly some sort of test was failed.

California's Prop. 37 would have required labeling of some food items if they contain genetically modified organisms (GMO's). It's hard to argue against people having a right to know what's in what they eat—a well-established right and practice, in fact, if you ever notice the ingredients lists on cans, bottles and other packaging. But the barrage of opposing messages worked like a voodoo charm.

The opposition campaign promulgated a line that 37 would cost the average consumer something like $400 per year. This seemed a dubious assertion from the start, so I went looking for where it originated. The answer: Out of thin air. It's sad that media outlets such as newspapers have bought the assertion, pushed and funded by agribusiness, and sadder still that some physicians and other presumably less-gullible professionals have as well. There was a nonpartisan analysis by a professor at Emory University's School of Law with a very impressive c. vitae, and she concluded: "Consumers will likely see no increases in prices as a result of the relabeling required by the Right to Know Act."

So much for that bogus cost argument. As for health issues, quite a few outlandish claims have been made about GMO's, both pro and con. As is often the case, the truth is likely in the middle: GMO's will neither save nor destroy humanity. I actually doubt most GMO foods are themselves bad for one's personal health; more hungry humans might get fed as a result of some GMO's, and that's a good thing. On the other hand, there are some worrying studies, and a fair number of good, unbiased scientists who think GMO's may indeed increase health risks in humans in some ways.

A recent study in rats was not enough to make any conclusive claims and might yet be discredited, but that's not enough to draw any conclusions on the broader issues. "More study is needed," as the researchers' mantra goes, which is why even the American Medical Association has recently called for pre-market safety testing of genetically engineered foods: "Recognizing the public's interest in the safety of bioengineered foods, the new policy also supports mandatory [Food and Drug Administration] pre-market systemic safety assessments of these foods as a preventive measure to ensure the health of the public," the American Medical Association said in June. "We also urge the FDA to remain alert to new data on the health consequences of bioengineered foods."

Labeling is almost as much a philosophical decision as a scientific one. At play is the increasingly-accepted "precautionary principle," which holds that in the face of scientific uncertainty about important issues, we err—if indeed it is error—on the side of safety, and wait for better scientific guidance. It's the "better safe than sorry" concept that guides our FDA regarding the approval of medications, and what many parents have told children for centuries. Another principle at play is a more modern "right to know" idea that is, again, well-established with respect to food ingredients and labeling in general, and with respect to GMO's in other nations. Even if GMO's are not themselves bad for us, we

"He who lieth down with dogs, shall rise up with fleas."
Benjamin Franklin (1706-1790)

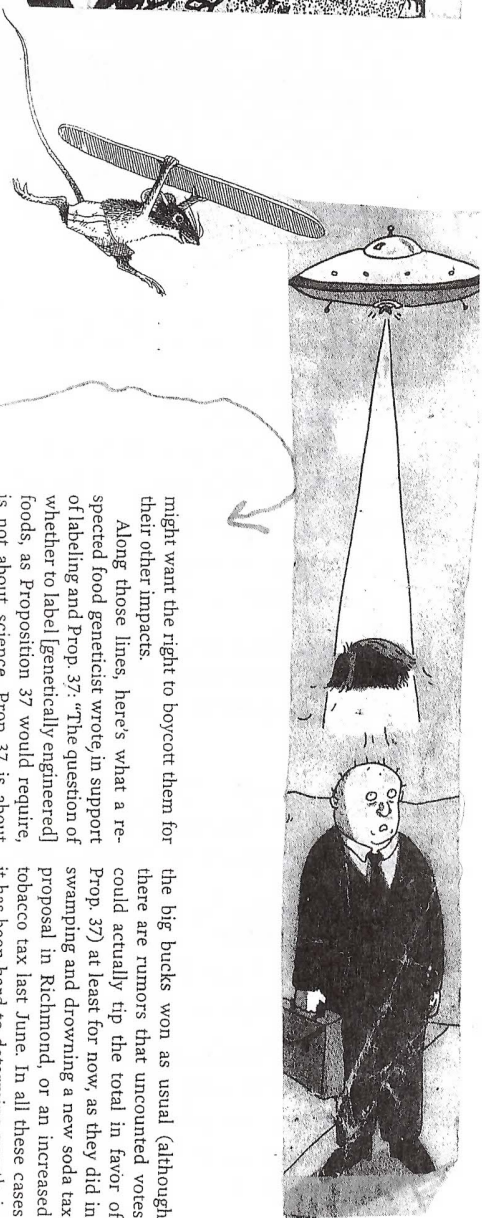

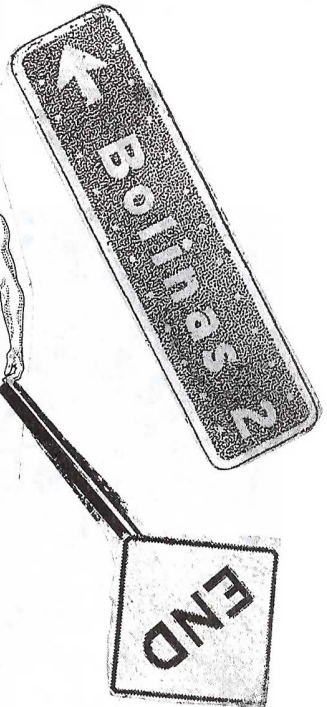

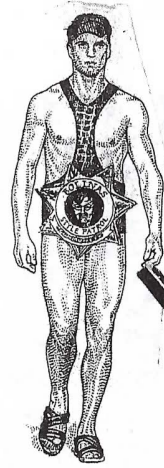

Vote for BOLINAS to be a socially acknowledged mature-loving town to like to drink the water out of the LAKES to like to eat the BEERRIES to like the BEAR'S is not hatred to hotels and motor boats.

BEAR'S

TEMPORARY and way to save life, skunks and foxes (and please, do not) and to make it beautiful.

might want the right to boycott them for their impacts.

Along those lines, here's what a respected food geneticist wrote, in support of labeling and Prop. 37: "The question of whether to label [genetically engineered] foods, as Proposition 37 would require, is not about science. Prop 37 is about people having the right to know what's in their food and how it was produced. It's about making competition in a free market—the hallmark of capitalism—more transparent."

And Pollan wrote: "Americans have been eating genetically engineered food for 18 years, and as supporters of the technology are quick to point out, we don't seem to be dropping like flies. But they miss the point. The fight over labeling [genetically modified] food is not foremost about food safety or environmental harm, legitimate though these questions are. The fight is about the power of Big Food. Monsanto has become the symbol of everything people dislike about industrial agriculture: corporate control of the regulatory process; lack of transparency (for consumers) and lack of choice (for farmers); an intensifying rain of pesticides on ever-expanding monocultures; and the monopolization of seeds, which is to say, of the genetic resources on which all of humanity depends."

Big Food and the people they buy to spread their message in the interests of profit spent something like $40 million to scare people away from labeling. That alone seemed reason to oppose them—what are they so afraid of? On the other side were the Consumers Union, the American Public Health Association and many others who want more truth in labeling as well as consumer choice. But the big bucks won as usual (although there are rumors that uncounted votes could actually tip the total in favor of Prop. 37) at least for now, as they did in swamping and drowning a new soda tax proposal in Richmond, or an increased tobacco tax last June. In all these cases it has been hard to determine exactly in whose pockets all that propaganda cash wound up. So again, I'm not sure if a litmus is the type of test we need—it might be more revealing to utilize something like the test for fecal matter in our drinking water. One thing is for sure, we're seeing a kind of pollution that's bad for our health—and our democracy.

MONDAY DECEMBER 3 AT 7:30 P.M.

MEETING ROOM: BOLINAS FIRE STATION,
COMMUNITY MEETING ROOM.

REBECCA WILSON'S MEMOIR, "A HOUSE WITH NO ROOF: AFTER MY FATHER'S ASSASSINATION" IS VERY POIGNANT AND HEARTFELT AS IT CHRONICLES THE UPS AND DOWNS OF HER FAMILY. AFTER THE MURDER OF HER FATHER IN 1966 ON THE STREETS OF SAN FRANCISCO, THE WILSONS MOVED TO BOLINAS WHERE REBECCA SPENT HER YOUTH. SHE LATER ATTENDED AND GRADUATED FROM SCRIPPS WOMEN'S COLLEGE AND SUBSEQUENTLY TRAVELED TO SCOTLAND ON A FELLOWSHIP. SHE PUBLISHED HER FIRST BOOK WHILE IN SCOTLAND: "SLEEPING WITH MONSTERS: CONVERSATIONS WITH SCOTTISH AND IRISH FEMALE POETS." SHE LIVES IN FAIRFAX.

IN ADDITION TO DISCUSSING HER MEMOIR, WILSON WILL ALSO TALK ABOUT THE CHALLENGES THIS PRESENTED.

THANKSGIVING.

The Thanksgiving dinner given at the Bolinas Community Center, last night, by Lia & Randi, proved yet once again that our BCC is the "HEART" of our town! (Ilka Hartman, for many year the usual sponsor of this event, is recuperating in the hospital. A get-well card was sent from table to table with a love message for her quick recovery!) The hall was filled to capacity with happy, hungry people who enjoyed a sumptuous, feast (potluck) plus lots of turkey & gravy! (The latter prepared by the BOCC & volunteer bakers). We all agreed how Thankful we are to live in our wonderful Community, Bolinas, with our "bellies full" of Great Food, amongst the "most interesting and talented people in the world!!!
