"ORIGINAL PANTALOOM WINDSOCKS @ GILLYFLOWER NURSERY"

My attempt at resurrecting the year-end Slideshow was a bit of a scramble but made for a fun night, if I do say so myself. I was totally blown away by all the beautiful photos of our powerful and colorful community that were submitted. We really have some amazing photographers in this town! If the pics don't lie, you all are looking good these days. It appears, at least, that we dance a lot.

It was great to get together by the fire for some food and drink with friends on a cold stormy night so I'll probably try to do a repeat showing later on this winter for everyone who missed it because they were gone visiting family, or at the Drake's Bay Oyster benefit, or reeling from the End of the Mayan Calendar or otherwise indisposed. So keep your ears open for another fun party and no, I won't put the slideshow up online; you'll just have to come next time.

Many many thanks to the great photographers who submitted pictures, including Ilka Hartmaan, Curly Rigg, Bill Braasch, Linda Samuels, Sam Neffati, Chris Bessenty, Charlie Callahan, StuArt and Marita Steffe. Also thanks to Lia for scrambling through the rain to get a last minute piece of technology and to Vanessa for serving up some tasty curry and always secretly making everything run right in my scattered life. Oh, and also thanks as usual to everyone who folded all the chairs...

Keep on Dancing

>>Jeff Manson, every other Friday editor.

READING TO JOHN

On Tues. 1/1 at 10 am on KWMR (89.9) I'll read two selections from Curzio Malaparte's "The Bird that Swallowed Its Cage," translated by our very own Walter Murch (a man of many talents). I'd never heard of this Italian writer, (1898-1957) but was utterly captivated by Walter and Aggie's recent presentation at Commonweal and wanted to share the intriguing material with you to start the new year.

Calling all poet, dancers, storytellers, songwriters, mimes, clowns, magicians, one act theatre troupes, weavers of miracles. The 19th of January at the Bolinas Community Center. Polish up whatever you have been saving and bring it down so we can love it. Sign up with Stuart or leave a message at 8830.

Anyone who wants to donate an outfit for the fashion show can contact me about making your donation tax deductible.

I am available Sunday and Monday down on Wharf Road, for anyone wanting to start a project or who wants help with sewing. If you just want to model you can come by and pick out what you want to wear. I am sewing a few outfits for a blacklight that I need to find some people to play in. They are blacklight primitive for up to 4 people, you don't have to be dancers you just have to be willing to improvise with light and movement. Anyone want to play?

And I need buttons if you have a jar of buttons sitting on your back shelf. Free Box Yourself!

GENETICALLY MODIFIED FOOD

DuPont deploys ex-cops to curb saving of seeds

By Jack Kaskey

DuPont Co., the world's second-biggest seed company, is sending dozens of former police officers across North America to prevent a practice generations of farmers once took for granted.

The provider of the best-selling genetically modified soybean seed is looking for evidence of farmers illegally saving them from harvests for replanting next season, which is not allowed under sales contracts. The Wilmington, Del., company is inspecting Canadian fields and will begin in the United States next year, said Randy Schlatter, a DuPont senior manager.

DuPont is protecting its sales of Roundup Ready soybeans, so called because they tolerate being sprayed by Monsanto Co.'s Roundup herbicide. For years enforcement was done by Monsanto, which created Roundup Ready and dominates the $13.3 billion biotech seed industry, though it's moving on to a new line of seeds now that patents are expiring. That leaves DuPont to play the bad guy, enforcing alternative patents so cheaper "illegal beans" don't get planted.

"Farmers are never going to get cheap access to these genetically engineered varieties," said Charles Benbrook, a research professor at Washington State University's Center for Sustaining Agriculture and Natural Resources. "The biotech industry has trumped the legitimate economic interests of the farmer again by raising the ante on intellectual property."

Farmers sued

Monsanto controls about 28 percent of the soybean market in the U.S., the largest producer and exporter last year, while DuPont has about 36 percent. The weed-killer-tolerant seeds and related licenses generated $1.77 billion in sales for Monsanto in the year through August, 13 percent of the company's total. DuPont had $1.37 billion in soybean revenue last year, 3.6 percent of total sales, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

The grain is used to make animal feed, cooking oil, tofu and bio-fuels, and it's the biggest crop after corn in the U.S.

Attacks on the modified food industry aren't new. Farmers criticized Monsanto in the 2008 Oscar-nominated documentary "Food, Inc." for contracts that keep them from saving seeds. The St. Louis company has sued 145 U.S. farmers for saving Roundup Ready soybeans since 1997, winning all 11 cases that went to trial, said Kelli Powers, a Monsanto spokeswoman. The U.S. Supreme Court last month agreed to consider the legality of such planting restrictions.

Heard It at The Hardware

By Robin Bradford

"It's-a seemple, eh? It's elegante, eh? Watch me, I show you dis' thing. It gives you a-nothing for not to love."

-Chef at Vanessi's Restaurant, San Francisco

In my twenties, I worked for a time on the Klamath, a refurbished ferryboat, home to the Landor Associates design group. A friend and I would sometimes escape to Vanessi's on Broadway for lunch, preferring seats at the crowded counter so we could watch the chefs and participate in what amounted to free cooking lessons. We'd munch on crusty sourdough as we waited for our cups of clam chowder, and on the rare occasions we felt flush, (typically coinciding with a payday), we'd treat ourselves to Zabaglione, the divine and creamy Italian custard.

Everything about Zabaglione is excellent. The way it has to be hand-whipped until one's arm is about to fall off. The way the egg yolks froth into a luscious lemony yellow with soft peaks that hold in the pan. The scent of Marsala as the alcohol nearly evaporates over a hot flame, and at Vanessi's, the flourish with which small stainless steel sundae dishes would be set in front of us.

Unlike revenge, Zabaglione is a dish best eaten warm.

One day, feeling the Zabaglione's tingly afterglow, we took a circuitous route back to the office, and chanced upon the shop of Thomas Cara, the lauded purveyor of espresso machines imported from Italy. We marveled at the elaborate copper and brass instruments as if they were exotic animals -- fascinating to watch, but too rare and precious to touch. And then, a gleaming copper pan with a round bottom and a riveted-on brass handle caught my eye. It was a Mauviel Zabaglione pan and it was exactly what the chefs at Vanessi's used. I wanted one of my very own, badly.

$40 might not seem like much, but back then, it amounted to a month's discretionary income. My rent was $130 a month and I had to be cautious in my spending to manage scraping that enormous sum together. But sometimes, even when no one else hears her, the muse beckons, and "yes" is the only appropriate response. This was one of those times. Despite the precariousness of my finances, buying the copper Mauviel felt like the highest and best use of my funds.

More than simply the one bright thing in my fledgling kitchen, the Zabaglione pan was the igniter of my confidence as a cook. It taught me an important lesson: with the right equipment, it is impossible to fail. And if that's too grand an extrapolation, at the very least, it's accurate to say that with a Zabaglione pan, it is impossible to make a bad Zabaglione.

Perhaps the custard would turn out just as well in a double boiler, but it would lack the drama and excitement of cooking it in a pan made for that sole purpose. So grab your Zabaglione pan if you have one, a double boiler if you don't, and enjoy the following classic recipe, passed down with a grin from a handsome young chef from the Vanessi's of long ago:

Vanessi's Zabaglione

Separate 6 egg yolks into a cold Zabaglione pan (or double boiler). Set aside the whites.

Using a sturdy half eggshell as your measuring device, add to the yolks:

6 measures of Marsala
6 measures of freshly squeezed lemon juice (approximately 4 whole lemons)
6 scant measures of white sugar

Set the pan over high heat, whisking the ingredients constantly, until soft peaks form. This will take approximately 6 to 8 minutes.

Serve immediately in cocktail glasses or sundae cups. Then sit back casually, ready to bask in the praise about to be heaped upon you.

I've found the best response is to affect a slight Italian accent and murmur, "It's a-simple, eh? And it gives you a-nothing not to love."
