The Pragmatic Impacts of Sanders' Big Dreams

Sarah van Gelder posted Apr 27, 2016

The race for the Democratic presidential nomination has pitted a dreamer against a realist, right? Bernie Sanders is the unrealistic one, and Hillary Clinton, the pragmatist, is the candidate who can get things done.

That's what many pundits say. But, even with Tuesday's setbacks to the Sanders campaign, it's worth examining which is actually unrealistic—Bernie's pledge to make the country more equitable and sustainable? Or Hillary's progressive talking points, given her deep ties to corporate power players?

One way to see if Sanders really is a dreamer is to look at his record as mayor of the city of Burlington, Vermont.

When Sanders took office, he quickly became known as a pragmatist.

As a candidate for mayor in 1980, Sanders focused on economic fairness just as he does today, and then, too, he was dismissed as a fringe candidate. He squeaked into office, winning by just 10 votes. But he was re-elected three times, each time by a larger margin. His accomplishments won over even many of his early opponents, according to professors and authors Peter Dreier and Pierre Clavel, writing in The Nation. And six years into his term, U.S. News and World Report named him one of the top mayors in the country.

When Sanders took office, he quickly became known as a pragmatist. At the time, rising rents threatened to displace lower-income residents. Sanders supported and helped fund the housing groups that later become the Champlain Housing Trust, which, at about 2,800 units, is now the largest, and reportedly the most successful, land trust in the country. The land trust buys and builds single-family homes and apartments, then sells or rents the homes, but holds on to the land so that the homes remain permanently affordable.

Even more than housing, the economy was a major focus of the Sanders administration, and his approach differed from that in most U.S. cities. Instead of competing with other cities to attract big corporations, his administration supported and encouraged local businesses.

The city helped Seventh Generation, a cleaning products company, start up in the 1980s; the company now has $300 million in annual sales.

Will Raap's Gardener's Supply Co. is another case in point. With Sanders' encouragement, Raap moved his company to the site of an old dump in the Intervale area of Burlington. There, the company used leftover heat from a nearby wood-waste-fired generating plant to heat its greenhouses. Over time, and with city support, Raap, the Intervale Center, and others cleared the junk from the land, launched a major composting operation, and formed an incubator where would-be farmers could try their hand at growing food. Now, that original dumpsite has been restored to fertile land, and 12 urban farms are located there, supplying 10 percent of the food sold in Burlington, according to The Nation. And Gardener's Supply, still located in Burlington, has grown to a 250-person, worker-owned business.

Sanders left office in 1989, but the policies and partnerships he created continue to shape the city. Today, Burlington's unemployment rate is 2.6 percent—the lowest of any city in the United States. Kiplinger's Personal Finance named Burlington one of its "great places to live" in 2013.

Skeptics say Sanders would be unable to get any of his agenda through a recalcitrant Congress. But the U.S. Congress has an approval rating of just 14 percent, according to an April CBS poll, while Sanders, according to an Atlantic/PRRI poll, has the highest favorability rating of any current presidential candidate, at 47 percent. If he's elected, members of Congress might find they will need to either get on his bandwagon or get voted out. Pundits and establishment politicians like to call visionary candidates unrealistic. If bringing in big campaign contributions from lobbyists and support from political insiders is what makes a candidate realistic, then Sanders falls behind. But if what counts are low unemployment and high quality of life, then Sanders' approach hits the pragmatic target.

The stage is set for a big change, even if Sanders ends his candidacy. His example of working for the common good and his willingness to stand up to corporate interests resonate with Americans, nearly 2 million of whom have contributed to the Sanders campaign. His success shows that an authentic populist can raise money, win races, take office, and, in collaboration with constituents, make real change.

ART OPENING AT CHAMELEON THIS WEEKEND

Chameleon is having its first ever
Art Opening, presenting paintings by **DAVID NELSON MARKS**

David is a Santa Fe, New Mexico resident with special ties to Bolinas as his brother and both sisters were longtime residents of Bo. He comes from a family full of artists, beginning with his father Sidney Marks, his brother Faren Dancer and his sister Allison Marks.

Although David has been "dabbling" in art for over 40 years, he was inspired about 4 years ago to use a whole new approach and became immersed in a highly prolific period in which he has created over 200 paintings.

I will be showing at Chameleon just a sampling of 8 of his smaller pieces from his vast collection. I will also have a way to show you pictures of some of his larger works.

Here is a quote from David on his art: "I often am able to give my paintings an aging quality, suggesting fossils, falling leaves, tree bark and natural structures decaying over time. I then overlay more formal structures that you would not find in the natural world"

Elderberry Wine by StuArt

The elderberry was first brought to my attention by Malcolm Margolin when he gave a talk at the New School at Commonweal. Malcolm Margolin runs Heyday Press out of Berkeley that specializes in books about native California. He wrote the pivotal book about the early inhabitants of the Bay Area called "The Ohlone Way"

Malcolm spoke about the Ohlone's high regard for the elderberry. How they would watch the bushes to see which branches danced in the wind. They would select those branches for their flutes and clappers. They called the Elderberry "the music bush."

Malcolm said that when the berries of the Elderberry ripened the Ohlone knew it was a good time to gather mussels.

I sensed a transmission of the Elderberry spirit and the Ohlone's high regard from Malcolm to me. Later at the Elder Fire at RDI I was sitting around the fire with my fellow elders and we were expressing gratitude.

"I'm grateful for . . ." I started off. Then I looked up and not far from the fire circle were three magnificent Elderberries in full bloom.

"I'm grateful for the Elderberry." I said. As I spoke I saw the Elderberries dip and sway in graceful response to my recognition. I felt an instant kinship with the Elderberry and a love for the Creation that the Elderberry and I shared.

I knew I am becoming an elder, but my real wish is to ripen into an Elderberry.

So I was inspired by the Elderberry and Malcolm Margolin and I wrote this song - I'll be singing it tonight.

The northwest winds have been howling the last few weeks. The winds can be an irritation as the waves are trashed, boating is at a minimum, and being at the beach means an exfoliating experience comes included, but, the spring winds also push a huge cold pulse of water, up from the many thousand foot depths off the continental shelf, up onto the shallow shelf that makes up our coastal zone. With the arrival of the wind borne cold nutrient rich water, and the strength of the spring and summer sun comes the fuel and the spark that sets off the food chain. Everything from the tiniest phytoplankton, crabs, shrimp, and all the way up to the blue whales, go gangbusters when the getting is good, and it's largely thanks to that springtime northwest wind. So when it's blowing a gale and you can't surf and there is sand drifting across the road, and your car is dirty as shit, there's a part of me that rejoices knowing the whole cycle is getting charged up for another go around.

BOLINAS COMMUNITY LAND TRUST UPDATE

Dear Bolinas Neighbors,

We would like to officially welcome and introduce to you our new Executive Director, Jerry Bernstein. Jerry comes to us after years of experience as a businessman and Chief Operating Officer of The Lighthouse, a non-profit in San Francisco. We are very excited about the possibilities that await our collaboration.

We would also like to announce that Evie Wilhelm has joined the permanent staff of the BCLT as Administrative Manager. She is capably managing the daily operations of the office, residential and retail properties. Evie's appointment was a result of her internship with the BCLT and we encourage more Bolinas young people to explore this program.

We extend our deep gratitude to Patrice Daley who served as our interim Executive Director for the past year. She has been on the staff of the land trust for years and did not hesitate to take on the very challenging job that was necessary to keep our boat afloat while we sought a permanent ED.

Please take the opportunity to visit our newly designed website, bolinaslandtrust.org, and consider becoming a member of our town's land trust. We believe that with our new Executive Director, Property Manager and retail tenants we are better prepared to serve our community now and into the future.

Sincerely yours,
Communications Committee of the Bolinas Community Land Trust Board

Acting Workshop with Patrice Daley...

... Leading up to the production of a Tony award-winning play "God of Carnage" as well as an original play in the process of being written by yours truly. Participating in the workshop does not commit you nor promise you a part in either play, but having an ensemble of committed Actors is vital to the process. The Workshop is rooted in the Stanislavski approach of creating truthful and believable theatre by drawing from your personal experiences to discover your character, and bringing your character and environment to life on stage moment to moment as in real life. Sounds intense but it's loads of fun (it's what many of the great actors do inherently) and we do a lot Improv to get there. Acting skills such as projection, clarity of voice, inner dialogue, stage physicality, blocking, and so forth are also attended to.

All levels are welcome, beginners are my specialty.

This Workshop is for you if you would like to develop or refresh acting skills for theatre, film, commercials, speeches, award acceptances, sales pitches (just don't try to sell us anything), academic presentations, complicated menu recitations, or if you simply would like to authentically tell your boss off in a clear, concise, and believable way that is at once engaging and memorable....

The Workshop requires per-registration, call Patrice at 415-868-2758 or email me at patricedaley@yahoo.com

The cost is $10 per night or whatever you got.
