Lightworkers in Pt. Reyes

by StuArt

Early Monday morning I drove up to Pt. Reyes to have my truck tuned up for the trip to the desert. After leaving my truck at Bracken Auto ("Come back at 2") I walked to the Bovine Bakery for a cup of coffee.

With plenty of time on my hands I planned to hang out for a while on the bench in front of the Bovine. I brought my own mug and for two bucks I got a cup of coffee with a free refill.

It was sunny and warm in front of the Bovine. Hermione was there looking at life drawings sketched by a man named August ("I was born in June but my parents got engaged in August.") The drawings were pretty good. It felt like art school there in front of the Bovine, and I enjoyed looking at life drawings with August and Hermione.

August left and I sat there drinking coffee and talking with Hermione about art-making and the struggle to make a living as an artist. She told me about painting the street people in Sausalito, and how Sausalito was not a bad place to sell art on the street.

I enjoyed talking about art and art-making with Hermione. I like Hermione's art. Her smoky, smouldering style reminds me of Tamara de Lempicka. We had a good time talking about art on the Bovine bench and Hermione invited me to paint with her on the porch of the little yellow house where she planned to work on her Sausalito street paintings and maybe sell a few.

Hermione left to set up and I dawdled for a while on the Bovine bench. When I finally got up and walked the short distance to the yellow house Hermione told me "I just sold a painting for $10 and now I can get breakfast."

A young woman with ebony skin and beautiful dark eyes approached with a ten dollar bill and handed it to Hermione in exchange for a portrait of one of the street characters from the Sausalito waterfront. Hermione mentioned her financial struggle as an artist.

"Oh yeah, Lightworker Syndrome." the young woman responded. Her name was Jazmine and when I looked closely at her face I was attracted by her soulful eyes sparkling with delight.

"Do you know Steve Pavlina?" Jazmine asked. "He wrote an article about Lightworker Syndrome. Here I'll send you the link." and she pulled out her iPhone and began to thumb it.

"What's the gist of Pavlina's article?" I asked Jazmine. She looked up and smiled. "It takes 20 minutes to read, and I'm not going to synopsise it for you but I'll send you the link. What's your email?"

I guessed what Lightworker Syndrome was all about — the struggle between love and money that any artist goes through.

Lightworker might be a more appropriate job title than Artist I thought to myself as I looked at the three of us, Hermione, Jazmine and myself gathered together in front of the little yellow house in Point Reyes.

Yes, we are more than Artists.

We are Lightworkers.

Japan nuclear utility says no special precautions over volcano

Japanese utility Kyushu Electric Power said on Monday that it was monitoring activity at a volcano near its Sendai nuclear plant, but did not need to take any special precautions after authorities warned of the risk of a larger-than-usual eruption.

The reactor is the first to be restarted under new safety standards put in place since the meltdowns at Fukushima in 2011.

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and much of Japanese industry want reactors to be switched on again to cut fuel bills, but opinion polls show a majority of the public oppose the move after the nuclear crisis triggered by an earthquake and tsunami.

The possibility of a significant eruption of Sakurajima, located about 50 km (30 miles) from Sendai, is a reminder of the volatile geology of Japan, which has 110 active volcanoes.

"We are not currently taking any particular response," Kyushu Electric spokesman Tomomitsu Sakata said by phone.

"There is no impact in particular to the operations" of the Sendai plant, Sakata said. "We will continue to pay close attention to information from the Japan Meteorological Agency."

The 890-megawatt-reactor had reached 50 percent of its output by Sunday and the operator expects full power to be achieved around Aug. 24, Sakata said.

Critics of the nuclear industry say that new safety measures are insufficient, particularly for plants such as Sendai, which is located near five giant calderas, crater-like depressions formed by past eruptions, with the closest one about 40 km away.

The precautions by Japan's Nuclear Regulation Authority for volcanic eruptions were "wanting in a number of important respects" and did not meet international standards, said John Large, chief executive of Large & Associates, a nuclear engineering consultancy.

Large wrote a report this year on the Sendai plant's ability to withstand being hit by volcanic ash and has testified in court about the issue.

Sakurajima is one of Japan's most active volcanoes and erupts almost constantly. There was a risk of larger than usual eruption, an official at the Japan Meteorological Agency said on Saturday.

"With Kyushu's volcanoes clearly more active, Sendai should be shut immediately," said Aileen Mioko

Smith, executive director at activist group, Green Action, claiming there was no viable evacuation plan for the plant.

The Meteorological agency raised the warning level on the peak, about 1,000 km southwest of Tokyo, to an unprecedented 4, for prepare to evacuate, from 3.

Seventy seven residents who live within a 3 km radius of the craters have been evacuated, an official said on Monday.

The Dance Palace will be closed for

I spoke with Dieter about the unique installation of his paintings at Commonweal. The paintings are hung from the ceiling in a configuration that resembles Stonehenge and befits the theme of the show "Spirit of Places"

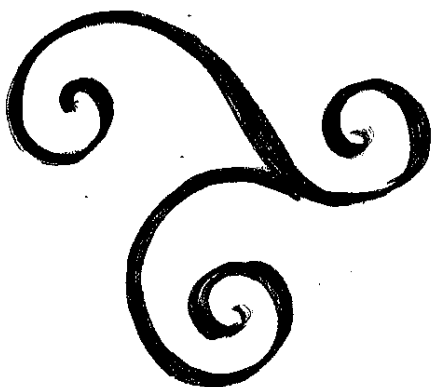

Dieter explained the process: "Wayne Campbell built a steel truss that was attached to the beams in the ceiling and we hung the paintings from that."

It's a great use of the space in the Big Room at Commonweal. Go see the show.

Below is a recent painting I did for Psychedelic Seniors, a newly formed local group.

THE NEW YORK TIMES

Tamara de Lempicka

One of the current exhibits at the Pinacothèque de Paris is Tamara de Lempicka : La reine de l'Art déco (lah ren duh lar dayko), which means "the queen of Art Deco." Lempicka, then known as Maria Górska, was born in Warsaw in 1898 to affluent parents. She lived a privileged life, attending a boarding school in Switzerland and vacationing on the French Riviera and Italy. After her parent's divorce and her mother's remarriage, Lempicka moved to St. Petersburg with an aunt. She set her heart on escaping as the bride of Tadeusz Lempicka, a notorious ladies' man captivated by her substantial dowry. The two became part of the flood of refugees after the Russian revolution. They bobbed around Europe, eventually washing ashore in Paris.

When her husband was unable or unwilling to work to support them in their new life, Lempicka turned to art to support them both. This was a natural fit, since she was friends with all the artists of the day, including Picasso, Jean Cocteau, and André Gide, and friends with all the right people. Portraiture was her specialty and aristocrats of Europe queued up for the pleasure of being painted in her distinct style. Lempicka charged top dollar, supporting her family rather well.

Her most famous work is a self-portrait, Tamara in the Green Bugatti (above) described as "a real image of independent woman who asserts herself." That sums up Lempicka to a T. She was bisexual and carried on a series of notorious affairs with other high-profile women, such as French writer Colette. Her husband divorced her in 1931. She neglected her only daughter, Kizette, palming her off on her mother when she wasn't in boarding school. In one famous story, when Lempicka announced that she wouldn't be home for Christmas, mama burned her designer hats one by one while Kizette watched. Merry Christmas, indeed. For all of that, Lempicka painted Kizette over and over again and even her portraits of others resembled Lempicka became the lover of a Hungarian Baron (after painting the portrait of his prior mistress) and then his wife. This netted her a title and social legitimacy in the highest circles, instead of just with bohemians. She felt change in the winds and urged her husband to divest himself of property in Eastern Europe and tuck it away in Swiss banks. They passed the war years in security in the United States, where the "baroness with the brush" painted the Hollywood stars of the day.

In the post-war years, her style changed and she traded her brushes for a palette knife, but her new paintings were not well received, and she retired from public life. When the Baron died, Lempicka moved to Texas with Kizette and her husband. (Coincidentally, Kizette's husband worked for the same company mine works for.) Lempicka wasn't there to cuddle her grandkids but to be served. She blamed her lack of success on a failure of "breeding," not hers, of course. She moved to Mexico to hang out with other jet set has-beens. Lempicka died in March 1980 and her ashes were scattered on the volcano Popocatepetl, which seems appropriate for this rather dramatic artist.

Eventually Lempicka's work was back in vogue. There was a well-received retrospective and her early paintings began to sell again. A long-running play about her life was presented in major cities. Then there was a one-woman show entitled Deco Diva. (I love that title!) The Last Nude, by Ellis Avery, is a fictionalized account of Lempicka's relationship with a model. Some high profile collectors of her work are Jack Nicholson, Barbra Streisand, and Madonna who has used Lempicka's images in her concerts and music videos, such as Vogue.
